Research interests

My main research interest is positive bias. I want to test the idea that most people see the world more brightly and more positive than it really is and that individuals who do not show this positivity bias may experience mental or social problems later in life. During my PhD in psychiatry, I investigated low positive bias in adolescence as an underlying mechanism of depression with different instruments and from different perspectives, combining longitudinal data collected every 2-3 years with more fine-grained momentary assessments, data from laboratory tasks, and biomarkers. In my current position as a postdoctoral researcher I focus on social rather than on mental functioning. Next to investigating social experiences of children and adolescents and mental and social functioning later in life, I coordinate the genetic part of the project, which is aimed at investigating genetic and environmental mechanisms of intergenerational transmission of peer experiences. Ultimately, my aim is to combine both research areas by studying positive bias from a developmental perspective, investigating when and how individual differences arise, what role genetic vulnerabilities and parenting play, and whether and at what ages individual differences in positive bias are associated with differences in mental problems and social development.

Awards

- 2019 Travel award (Society for Research in Child Development)
- 2018 PhD top publication award for the paper 'Reward-Related Attentional Bias at Age 16 Predicts Onset of Depression During Nine Years of Follow-Up' (Research Institute SHARE)
- 2015 Award for best poster presentation 'Measuring BDNF in saliva: not yet possible with commercial ELISA kits' (Society for Ambulatory Assessment)
- 2000 Scholarships received for studying one semester at University College London from the following funders: Marco Polo Fonds, Hendrik Muller's Vaderlandsch Fonds, and Focus UK.

Activities to bring research outside academia

- 2019 At Noorderzon 2019 I co-organized the Noorderlichten activity 'Like parent, like child?'. Noorderlichten is an event to bring scientific research outside academia and give children and other non-scientists the opportunity to experience what it is like to do research. During our activity, children and their parents were invited to investigate for themselves how similar they were in looks, physics, character and emotions. The posters we made for the assignments and to explain the influence of genetics and parenting have been made publicly available on OSF (<https://osf.io/6f59z/>).
